Communicating Risk Information, Talking by Numbers

Synopsis

Health literacy and numeracy skills amongst the general population are frequently poor, which impedes their understanding of important health information.

Stressful environments, e.g. women with breast cancer discussing their GEP risk of recurrence results can make it difficult to process complex information effectively.

Doctors and nurses can help these discussions by being aware of their numeracy limitations and considering different ways to express risk.